drowning in potential suitors allana pratt explains that it s because women attempt the impossible our culture consistently gives women the impression that by behaving a certain way and offering men what society tells us these men want women can secure a man who provides security affection and lasting companionship but no one can actually change their personality and women who try to do so create an impression of insecurity and desperation that is inherently unattractive to other people particularly those who might be potential partners it can often seem that the women who attract the most men are those who simply aren t trying to be appealing at all that s only half true allana explains those women aren t trying to be appealing to men they re trying to be appealing to themselves men are attracted to the security confidence and inherent happiness that are the natural side effects of changing to please oneself in how to be and stay sexy allana breaks down the psychological and emotional reasons for stopping the ultimate destructive cycle trying to change to please a man only to find that men still find you unappealing using both personal and professional anecdotes to illustrate her points allana creates a compelling argument for self love with empathy and compassion for her fellow women who have fallen prey to destructive cycles in the past allana also helps them see that to find the ultimate partner in life and love they need to traverse a counterintuitive path instead of forging toward the man of their dreams women truly need to go deeper into themselves read and see

An idealized view of the lifestyle of a Buddhist monk might be described according to the doctrinal demand for emotional detachment and ultimately the cessation of all desire. Yet, monks are also enjoined to practice compassion, a powerful emotion and equally lofty ideal and live with every other human feeling: love, hate, jealousy, ambition while relating to other monks and the lay community. In this important ethnography of Buddhism in Sri Lanka, Jeffrey Samuels takes an unprecedented look at how emotion determines and influences the commitments that laypeople and monastics make to each other and to the Buddhist religion. In general, by focusing on multimoment histories, Samuels highlights specific junctures in which ideas about recruitment, vocation, patronage, and institution building are dynamically negotiated and refined. Positioning a nexus between aesthetics and affect, he illustrates not only how aesthetic responses trigger certain emotions but also how personal and shared emotions at the local level shape notions of beauty. Samuels uses the voices of informants to reveal the delicately negotiated character of lay monastic relations and temple management in the fields of religion and Buddhist studies. There has been a growing recognition of the need to examine affective dimensions of religion. His work breaks new ground in that it answers questions about Buddhist emotions and the constitutive roles they play in social life and religious practice. Throughout, Samuels makes the case for the need to account for emotions in making intelligible the behavior of religious participants and practitioners. Drawing on a decade of fieldwork that includes numerous interviews as well as an examination of written and visual sources, attracting the heart conveys the manner in which Buddhists describe their own histories, experiences, and encounters as they relate to the formation and continuation of Buddhist monastic culture in contemporary Sri Lanka. The book will be of interest to scholars and students of religion, Buddhist studies, anthropology, and South and Southeast Asian studies.
